

Allowing cell phone use while in-flight would be a huge mistake. It would be nice to think that common courtesy and concern for fellow passengers would prevail but we all know that will not be the case. People with cell phones already disrupt those around them in nearly every other public space and allowing it to happen while everyone is confined to the small space of an airplane with no avenue for escape would just be asking for trouble. Confrontations between passengers would be inevitable. Also, on every flight I've been on, there's always that one passenger who has to be told repeatedly by flight attendants to turn off their electronic devices or put their seat in the upright position. Expecting flight attendants to settle disputes between rude cell phone users and the poor souls seated next to them would be an additional burden. It's bad enough that they are allowed to turn cell phones on right after landing. (Surely I can't be the only one who thinks this poses a security risk?) Please, do NOT allow cell phone use on airplanes while in-flight!
